low management transition and wait times The grade eleven class spent less time in instruction and more time in engagement than the grade eight class Both classes showed a similar amount of opportunities to respond during activity but the eleventh grade class exhibited higher successful student responses The cognitive engagement was integral to the functioning of both units This included time used by the students instead of direct instruction by the teacher for learning a skill reviewing material learned planning a strategy at the beginning of a game implementing change in activity during the game and reflecting on activity after the game The study revealed that both teacher and students understood and could visibly see the benefits that cooperative learning offered to the physical education program This example of cooperative learning in physical education incorporated the basic elements of positive interdependence individual accountability face to face interaction social and interpersonal skills and group processing which are germane to effective cooperative learning
